

KAUNEIMMAT
Loululaulut™

The Greatest Christmas Carols are being sung again for children around the world. Too many children are being left without the care, nutrition, education and security they need.

The past year has been a trial for all of us, but the most vulnerable children are the ones who suffer the most.

You can help.

Give your gift to someone who would otherwise not receive one.

A photograph of two young children of African descent peeking through a green-painted wooden door frame. The child in the foreground is lying on their stomach, resting their chin on the door frame, wearing a yellow shirt. The child behind them is leaning their head against the first child's head, wearing a colorful patterned shirt. Both children are smiling at the camera. The background is slightly blurred, showing more of the door and the children's clothing.

"When I started school, I did not even know my name. I had never met another deaf people, so I thought I was the only one who was different. The only one in the world.

I learned how to sign in school. It is amazing how hands can be used to speak with other people.

Now I know my name: Netsanet, which means freedom."

A group of approximately ten children and one woman are standing in a narrow alleyway between simple, single-story buildings. The buildings have walls made of concrete blocks or mud-brick. The roofs are made of corrugated metal, some of which are rusted or damaged. Two large satellite dishes are mounted on a wall in the background. The children are dressed in casual clothing, and some are waving. The woman is holding a young child. The overall scene suggests a community in a developing area.
