Christmas is a season of joy. But not all children are able to share in that joy.

The Covid-19 pandemic limits children's access to health care and schooling. Too many children are left without the care, nutrition, education and security they need.

The past year has been a trial for all of us, but the most vulnerable children are the ones who suffer the most.

Felm is committed to promoting human dignity and justice around the world.

Together we work in more than 20 countries. We focus on helping girls, orphans, persons with disabilities, marginalized minorities and children living in extreme poverty.

"Children are not able to defend themselves but are the most vulnerable all. That is why they need our support. Join us in helping the world's children!"

"When I started school, I did not even know my name. I had never met another deaf people, so I thought I was the only one who was different. The only one in the world.

I learned how to sign in school. It is amazing how hands can be used to speak with other people.

Now I know my name: Netsanet, which means freedom."

A group of approximately ten children and one woman are posing for a photo in a slum. The woman, with dark hair and a floral shirt, is holding a young child on her shoulders. The children are dressed in casual clothing, some waving at the camera. They are standing in a narrow alleyway between simple, one-story buildings. The building on the left has a wall made of grey concrete blocks and a corrugated metal roof. Two large satellite dishes are mounted on the roof of this building. The building on the right is made of light-colored mud or plaster. In the background, more buildings and some greenery are visible under a clear blue sky.
